Please note that some of these records may be closed for 100 years.

As early as an Act of 1406, it was decreed that: "...every man or woman, of what estate or condition that he be, shall be free to set their son or daughter to take learning at any school that pleaseth them within the realm..." However, it was not that easy to put this into practice.

From the late 17th century, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (SPCK), an Anglican organisation, aided the foundation of parochial schools. The Act of Uniformity of 1662 required all schoolmasters and tutors to be loyal to the Church of England. Through the Declaration of Indulgence of 1672 and the Toleration Act of 1689, the nonconformist religions began to establish their own academic centres.

Also in the 17th century many private schools for young children, run by women in their own homes and known as dame schools, were popular in many towns and villages. Charity schools were set up, and these were often known as Blue coat, Green coat or Grey coat schools. Workhouse schools were attached to the parish workhouses, particularly after the General Workhouse Act of 1723 when Overseers of the Poor could engage a schoolmaster.

Voluntary schools were set up by individual societies. These included such establishments as the Royal Lancastrian Institution, known from 1814 as the British Foreign School Society or British Schools. In Oxfordshire many National Schools were established by the National Society who promoted the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church. These National School foundations survive today in many cases as Church of England Primary Schools.

The 1870 Elementary Education Act saw the formation of School Boards and Board Schools. This allowed local authorities to found schools in parishes where existing education provision was lacking.

The 1902 Education Act saw the creation of Secondary Schools and the abolishment of School Boards as their duties were handed over to the County Councils.

The 1944 Education Act saw changes to the provision of Secondary Education with the raising of the school leaving age to 15.

Where are these records?

Many school records have not survived, particularly those of the dame schools and the workhouse schools. Some parish school records can be found within the parish records catalogue.

The Macclesfield House collection

This collection consists of records of a survey of Oxfordshire Schools carried out by Percy Elford the first Chief Education Officer of Oxfordshire County Council. The records consist of administrative records regarding the state of the school and the equipment and staffing available, accounts of the school and records of charitable bequests the school benefitted from. There are also a number of plans and photographs which have been digitised and are available to view via links in the online catalogue on Picture Oxon.

Where is the catalogue?

The catalogues of individual schools, including those in parish collections and the Macclesfield House collection, are available online at Heritage Search.
